Only One Meat Per Meal

In British Restaurants

LONDON.—A food order just issued makes it illegal "to obtain a meal" more than one course of fish, meat, poultry, game, eggs or cheese.

The order became effective March 10 and applies to all restaurants and catering establishments.

It prohibits the serving of both poultry and meat, or poultry and game, but permits one egg and bacon at a meal.

The restaurant proprietor and the customer are liable to imprisonment and fines for violation of the new order.

Lights of New York

by L. L. STEVENSON

Red Ears: The other afternoon, a business man whose reverse—his family calls it shyism—when it comes to meeting or conversing with the fair sex is well known, finding that appointments would keep him in his office late, telephoned his wife to meet him in a midtown restaurant for dinner. After the meal, they took the subway uptown and, after a little search they found a bakery that was still open. The husband, enjoying a smoke, said, "I would wait outside. Well, he waited and waited. Finally becoming impatient, he went into the bakery, the counter of which was crowded with women. But he spotted a back that looked familiar. It was the wife, who he had just met. He whispered, "Don't buy too much, sweetheart." And the young girl who turned around indignantly was not his wife.

Street Scene: A sign painter, working carefully with precious gold leaf, lettering a window . . . A group of school boys, some of whom were playing with a battered old doll . . . A dealer carefully turning tomatoes into green parts didn't show . . . A locksmith busy turning out a key in his little open-front shop while a customer waits impatiently . . . Two young men idling on the corner, discussing the Yankees' 1941 pennant chances . . . The sign painter finishes his work . . . Instead of putting his tools away, he takes the doll from the little girl, and after a few deft brush strokes, he hands it back with a smile. The little girl cries with delight . . . seemingly by a miracle, her doll has gold hair.

Motor City Note: One of this department's Detroit scouts reports that the recent primary edged his memory in regard to an election incident was so interested in the election that he remained away night after night working for his favorite candidate. Finally the votes were counted and the next night, instead of going out, he settled down in an easy chair. His six-year-old daughter stared at him in amazement for a little while, then asked him if he intended to stay at home.

"Yes, Carol," replied the father. "All evening, daddy!"

"Yes," remarked the child gravely. "Thank God for that!"

Merry-Go-Round: Staying away from B'way for another paragraph, here is a Washington happening as reported by Bill: As he was on his way to the office the other morning, a messenger boy came up and asked him how to get to a certain address. Bill had just started to give directions when an out-of-town car stopped and the driver asked for a taxi. Without hesitation, the boy told him and then turned to Bill for the rest of his instructions. And the incident, Bill maintains, still gives him a sort of warbling.

World War Yarn: They were talking about the last war. Two American officers who had had a hard time at the front were relaxing in a French village where they were billeted in one of the few two-story houses. Lieutenant X had a dinner engagement which turned out to be quite a party. When he finally decided it was bedtime, the stairway creaked and slid under his feet so that his progress was a series of falls and partial recoveries. He finally made the room in which he and Captain Z had cots and, shoving the captain wide awake, managed to make him understand that a friend of theirs was coming to see them. The captain began to clear up in the morning when the lieutenant was nursing his scraped and discolored shins. He was negligent in not completing your report," the captain said. "A lieutenant had been falling upstairs but he had the right spirit and finished his job. How's some arm."

End Piece: Harvard boys recently got newspaper space again by nominating the girl with whom they would not like to be stranded on a desert isle with a Halvadan man. (Hall Syndicate—WNU Service.)

New Breeding Process Aids Growth of Trout

SEATTLE, WASH.—Trout fishermen who recount their alleged prowess soon may find themselves telling far instead of fancy.

Dr. Laure E. Donaldson of the University of Washington school of fisheries announced that he is breeding trout that grow to maturity in just half the time of the ordinary species.
